AARP Florida Social Security Survey February 3, 2005

In late-January and early February, 2005, AARP commissioned five state telephone surveys of representative adult samples (age 18+) in: North Dakota, Montana, Nebraska, Arkansas, and Florida. Approximately 700 interviews were conducted in each of the above five states. These surveys gave AARP an opportunity to present state-level views of private accounts when the consequences of such accounts are considered.

This report will highlight the Florida state survey data. The survey methodology is described at the end of this report, and a tabulated questionnaire is appended.

AARP is a non-partisan organization. It does not contribute to political campaigns nor does it endorse or oppose any candidates for public office.

Key Findings

Overall view of the need for Social Security Reform. Floridians were asked to choose one of four statements about Social Security. One-quarter (24%) believe that the Social Security program has no serious problems. A further 22% think that Social Security has minor problems that can be fixed with slight changes to the current system. Thus, nearly half of Floridians believe that Social Security has either no problems or only minor problems. Nearly 3 in 10 (27%) believe that Social Security has serious problems that require substantial changes to the current system. A fifth thinks that Social Security's problems are so bad that the current system should be replaced (22%). Thus, 7 in 10 (73%) Floridians believe in reforming the Social Security system, not replacing it with something else.

Overall view of private accounts. Floridians are split over support for (47%), or opposition to (45%), private accounts when the survey question simply asks about the option to invest some of their Social Security contributions, and does not specify consequences. Eight percent are unsure of where they stand on this issue.

Whereas Floridians who favor private accounts were evenly divided between strongly favor and somewhat favor, Floridians who oppose private accounts were twice as likely to strongly oppose private accounts (31%) than they were to somewhat oppose (14%) them. That is, intensity of feeling about private accounts was much greater on the oppose side than it was on the favor side.

Anticipated effect of private accounts on Social Security. Half of Floridians believe that allowing workers to invest some Social Security payroll taxes in the stock market will weaken Social Security (48%) than believe it will strengthen Social Security (36%); and 15% do not know.

Taking into account some consequences of private accounts. When several consequences of private accounts are introduced, we find that between a third to two-thirds of those who initially favored private accounts ended up opposed to private accounts.

The consequences that proved to be of most concern to supporters of private accounts revolved around the associated cuts to Social Security benefits, and the new federal debt caused by draining money from Social Security to create private accounts. Specifically, 65% of supporters would drop their support if private accounts could not make up for the cuts to Social Security benefits private accounts would cause. Fifty percent of supporters would drop their support if changing the way Social Security benefits are calculated would result in reduced benefits. Fifty-seven percent of supporters would drop their support if creating private accounts means new federal debt to make up for funds drained from Social Security.

The possibility of having to create a new federal agency to administer private accounts resulted in over one-third (39%) of Floridians who initially supported private accounts turning to oppose them. If creating private accounts would result in there being winners and losers, 46% of those who initially supported private accounts dropped their support. The fact that people with private accounts would have to pay management fees resulted in a third who switched from support to opposition.

Total opposition to private accounts among Floridians. If we add the respondents who dropped their support in response to each consequence of private accounts, to those who initially opposed private accounts, we get a clearer picture of where Floridians stand on the private account issue.

Table 1 lists all the consequences read to respondents who originally initially favored allowing workers to invest up to $1,300 of their Social Security contributions in individual retirement accounts. The favor or opposition percentages are recalculated percentages based on the entire survey sample. That is, the initial group opposed to private accounts as measured by the first private account question, added to those who dropped their support for private accounts in response to each consequence of private accounts.

When respondents are exposed to the benefit cuts, greater federal debt, or the passing of debt to our children, caused by draining money from Social Security in order to create private accounts, majorities oppose these accounts. In fact, the initial 47% of the adult public who favor private accounts drops to between 13% and 27% depending on the consequence presented.

(n= 613)
Would you still favor private accounts if it meant...?

	Private Accounts
	Still Favor	Oppose
Workers pay management fees associated with private accounts	27	62
New government agency created to administer program	24	64
Diverting some of Social Security payroll taxes means large new federal debt in order to pay current retirees benefits	18	72
Losers of private accounts will need additional help from government	22	67
Cuts to your guaranteed SS benefits would be so severe that you could not make up the difference with money earned from your private acct.	13	76
Changes to the way SS benefits are calculated would result in cuts in guaranteed benefits for everyone not just people who choose to participate in private accounts program	21	69

Methodology

AARP commissioned Woelfel Research, Inc., a national survey research firm, to conduct a random digit dial (RDD) telephone survey of the 500 adults, age 18+, in each of five states (North Dakota, Montana, Nebraska, Arkansas, and Florida). Interviews were conducted between January 27th and February 1st. Each state survey has a sampling error of plus or minus 4 percentage points. This means that in 95 out of 100 samples of this size, the results obtained in the sample would fall in a range of 4 percentage points below or above what would have been obtained if every adult in the state had been surveyed.

For presentation purposes, percentage points have been rounded off to the nearest whole number. As a result, percentages in a given table column may total slightly higher or lower than 100%. For questions that permit multiple responses, columns may total to significantly more than 100%, depending on the number of different responses offered by each respondent. Similarly, when only selected responses are shown, percentages may total less than 100%.
